

ECO315: Behavioral Economics

The study of situations in which actual human choices differ from the predictions of standard economic theory. Topics may include cooperation versus self-interest, altruism, bounded rationality, and the use of reference points to shape decisions. Students will also explore experimental economics as the primary source of learning in this field.

Credit Hour(s): 3

Prerequisites:

ECO223.

Department: Business and Economics

Semester Offered:

Fall (odd)